"Some Irishmen, not of Gaelic stock, speak of Irish as foreign to them and would maintain English in the principal place now and in the future. We do well then to make clear to such one that he is asked to adopt the language for Ireland's sake as a nation and for his own sake as a citizen. If he wishes to serve her he must stand for the language; if he prefers English civilisation he should go back to England. There only can he develop on English lines. An Irishman in Ireland with an English mind is a queer contradiction, who can serve neither Ireland nor England in any good sense, and both Ireland and England disown him."

— Terence MacSwiney ("Principles of Freedom")

"That is the justification of the language. It awakens and draws to expression minds that would otherwise be blank. Again in subtle ways, we cannot wholly understand, it gives the Irish mind a defence against every other mind, taking in comradeship, whatever good the others have to offer, while retaining its own power and place. The Irish mind can do itself justice only in Irish."

— Terence MacSwiney ("Principles of Freedom")
